Getting Ready for Your First Visit

It's common to feel anxious about seeing a therapist for the first time. Knowing what to expect ahead of time may help you feel more prepared for your first visit.

How do I know if therapy is right for me?

You don't need to have a diagnosed condition to benefit from speaking with a therapist. Sometimes experiencing a specific event such as the loss of a loved one or a traumatic encounter can prompt a desire to seek therapy. Other times you may just notice that you're feeling different than you normally feel.

How long does each therapy session last?

Sessions typically last 50 minutes to 1 hour. Providers may offer sessions in person, by phone, and/or virtually.

How many sessions should I have/how often will I be going?

This varies from person to person. Discuss this with your therapist.

How do I prepare and what should I expect during my first visit?

On the first visit, the therapist will gather information about your personal and mental health history and answer any questions you may have. You will work together to clarify why you're seeking therapy and what you'd like to get out of it - this is called goal-setting.

How do I get to know a therapist/What questions can I ask?

Before you meet with a therapist consider reading their bio online. They will usually list specialties, types of therapy they use, as well as general information about their approach and style.

What should I look for in a therapist?

Take some time to find a therapist who you feel you connect with - the more comfortable you feel, the more likely you are to get the most out of your time together.
